When the COVID pandemic essentially ended, activities placed on hold became tenable again. Meanwhile, all the costs of maintaining a household continued: mortgage payments, utilities, streaming services, etc., while food prices increased significantly.

So, what happens to the garden you planted during those years of isolation: the fresh vegetables that tasted so much better than store-bought, and cost less, or the vase of flowers picked of the perennials you planted? Where in your family’s budget does that garden fit in now?

There is much home gardeners can do to adapt their horticultural practices in the face of monetary constraints. In this year’s edition of The Prairie Garden, you will learn how the three R’s (reduce, reuse & recycle) can help to maintain that garden, e.g., how to save seeds and store rainwater, or protect your transplants from four-legged ‘neighbours’. Whether a newcomer or garden veteran, there’s much you can do to retain that garden you’ve grown to love. And as always, included, are numerous articles of more general interest.
