As gardeners, we care. For our bountiful vegetable gardens and our beautiful perennial flower beds. For the fruit bushes and trees in our realm, and the birds and other creatures that share our space. We also care for the earth, especially in this time of climate change. So how can gardeners help care for the planet?

First, be informed. Learn what climate change is and how it will affect our gardening practices. Guest editor, Dr. Danny Blair, co-director of the Prairie Climate Centre and professor in the Dept. of Geography at the University of Winnipeg, shares his expertise in climate change with a focus on the prairie provinces. Dr. Blair and other authors will help you understand climate change and its effect on us as home gardeners now and in the future.

Next, learn how to help. There is much we can do to adapt our gardening practices to the changing climate. Read about the use of native and drought-resistant plants, water management, composting, and the importance of healthy soil. Discover how to reduce your carbon footprint. And, as always, there are articles of general interest for new and veteran prairie gardeners.
